HYGIENE OF GAS It's Aid in Ventilation

NOT the least among the advantages of the use of gas for lighting and other purposes is the marked beneficial effect upon hygienic conditions.

In connection with this subject it is well to call attention to a prevailing erroneous opinion built upon insufficient knowledge or superficial thought. It is often stated that the products of gas combustion vitiate the air. All impartial investigations by competent authorities have shown that this statement is groundless, and that, due to unexpected but none the less reasonable and effective causes, the burning of gas in small quantities such as are required for lighting is always accompanied by an improvement in the breathing quality of the air. Furthermore, gas light has been found to be comparatively free from the injurious effects upon the eyes which have lately become so painfully apparent with the more glaring light sources.

Exhaustive Scientific Tests

During a period of three months in 1907, Dr. Samuel Rideal, of Royal Westminster Institute, London, carried on a most exhaustive series of tests to determine the relative hygienic effects of gas and electric lighting. These tests left nothing to be desired in the matters of thoroughness. The complete results are too lengthy to be fully set forth here, but they plainly showed:

1. That the pulse rate, frequency of respiration, blood pressure, number of blood corpuscles, body temperature, bodily weight, and mental fatigue over the entire three months' test showed no greater change with gas lighting than with electric lighting.
2. That the percentage of carbonic acid gas and moisture in the air varied no more with gas lighting than with electric lighting of equal intensity, and that the rise in room temperature at the breathing level was substantially the same in either gas or electricity both with and without adequate facilities for ventilation. The gas-lighted room was somewhat cooler under the latter condition.
